NOTE FROM THE EDITOR

For those who don't know, I started on this beat in New York about five years ago as a community reporter covering the South Bronx. Since joining Waste Dive, my beat has expanded well beyond the five boroughs, but the New York market is still one of the most dynamic we follow around the country. Today's newsletter happens to include developments on two of the first local waste stories I ever covered – franchising and transfer stations.

Our lead feature has been in the works since I left a marathon June hearing with more questions than answers about the competitive implications of commercial waste zones in New York. After a few months and dozens of conversations, we've created what I hope will be a helpful primer for readers from anywhere in the country ahead of an approaching resolution to this years-long debate.

While the campaigning up to this point has already been intense, I have a feeling the next phase will be even more fascinating to watch regardless of what happens. If you have thoughts, feelings or tips about any of our stories I'm always glad to hear from you.

DEEP DIVE

Who comes out on top if New York passes commercial waste zones?

How many local haulers will be left to win franchise contracts, and whether any new entrants join the fray, all comes down to how legislative negotiations play out.

UPDATED

NWRA loses challenge to New York transfer station capacity law

The hard-fought "waste equity" law signed in 2018 will allow the city to restrict permitted capacity at sites in three different boroughs. Industry operators say it will unfairly harm their business and may appeal the decision.
